was highly unstable, so the text was copied to here. I have made some corrections to the French. The Genealogical Department reference is the source of the d'Mailly (de Mailly) connection with the Van Ordens. The validity and correctness of this pedigree is a topic of some debate. Nevertheless, it is presented here for anyone who would pursue it. It was news to me that Pierre de Mailly might be the same person as Pierre Mabile de Nevy. Note that seigneur is not a name, but a title of vague specificity. Dukes, counts, barons, marquises, etc. are all "seigneurs" which is merely the French word for "lord." Note too that Neuvy-sur-Loire is a municipality very much alive in modern France. The answer to our dilemma may simply be that there were two Pierres that immigrated to Naarden or that both are the same as has been assumed by the genealogist that made this connection. Certainly, if he or she was wrong, his or her work has been at the root a great deal of misguided pedigrees as other families than just the Van Ordens have tapped into this work.]

25536. Seigneur Pierre D'MAILLY was born¹ 28 Jun 1542 in Neuvy-sur-Loire, Nievre, France. He died² 1580 in Naarden, Amsterdam, Holland, and was buried in Naarden, Amsterdam, Holland. Pierre married Antionette D'DUMOND on 1568 in Noyant, Maine et Loire, Anjou, France,,,. [\[Parents\]](#)

Pierre Mabile, Seigneur de Nevi has been regarded an the founder of the Mabie-Mebie family that came to America. According to tradition he had estates in Neuvy which seems to be the present village of Neuvy-en-Mauges, Anjou. Pierre apparently fled during the St. Bartholomew's Massacre of 24 Aug.

1572 to Holland. He is supposed to have been of high rank in the army of the Admiral, Gaspard de Coligny.

From the Maybee Society files. The data is not verified and is possibly incorrect.

25537. Antionette D'DUMOND was born about 1555 in Neuvy-sur-Loire, Nievre, France.

[Note: it is unclear why Antoinette's family name would be D'DUMOND since the du part is already de + le. D'Dumond would read, "of of the Mount." It would be interesting to peruse the original documents from which the names d'Mailly and d'Dumond were taken.]
